Gary, as you are aware, we are canvassing personnel deployed to GTMO to determine if any of same observed any examples of prisoner abuse. That raised a question in my mind in any potential case where a respondent replied in the affirmative and had not previously reported same to anyone. If you proceed from the principle that they would have had an affirmative responsibility to report such observations, any failure to do so may constitute misconduct and at the extreme, criminal conduct. Our canvas thus far does not seem to be uncovering any such problems but I think it prudent, if we are not doing so already, that we reiterate their responsibilities in this regard to personnel, predeployment. Any thoughts?
